Engaging an Agent:

The professor's agents have a hard time remembering exactly what their super-secret pass-phrases are (seeing as they have to remember more important things, like the boiling point of poison, and the square root of orange). This is why they have developed a short-hand pictographic system.

A pass phrase contains a number of important elements, which are the only thing that matters. As long as you hit the proper contents, then it doesn't matter what you say. But in order to maintain the facade that the code is not so simple, it is suggested that agents fluff up the language superfluously.

Responding agents are encouraged to 'shake their heads ruefully' until a proper secret phrase is actually attained.
